By WILSON GRIFFIN
How effective are so-called effortless exercisers? Do they improve muscle strength? Such electronic and mechanical devices cannot benefit a person in any real way. To a limited degree they can firm and strengthen muscles. However there is no substitute for personal exertion and these and exercise of muscles to improve and strengthen them. Most important is to strengthen the heart and lungs, and this is only accomplished by personal exercise, such as fast walking, jogging, bicycling, badminton, volleyball, and other forms of fairly strenuous exercise. It can and should be fun.
