Service Regulations Revised

The federal government has revised regulations governing training and employment services available to armed forces veterans.

As a consequence, public employment offices will ensure that veterans receive all possible assistance in finding jobs or getting into job training programs.

In Shelby and Kings Mountain, Franklin L. Ware, Jr., Manager of the Employment Security Commission Job Service office says the Vietnam-era Veterans Readjustment Assistance Act requires the Secretary of Labor to afford veterans maximum opportunities in seeking jobs or training through Department of Labor programs.

The revised regulations interpret this requirement through a referral preference given veterans by state Job Service offices. Through this referral preference, local offices of the ESC make services such as registration, interviewing, counseling, testing, and referral to jobs or training opportunities available to all veterans on a priority basis.

Such services are also available to spouses of veterans who are totally disabled, killed in action, missing in action, or prisoners of war on the same basis as for veterans.

The revised regulations set standards that Job Service offices must meet in providing assistance to veterans of the armed forces. The regulations also provide veterans the opportunities to file complaints with ESC offices if they feel regulations have not been followed, according to Ware. The regulations ensure that veterans receive first priority in the provision of available employment programs.
