The Cleveland County Agricultural Extension Service is offering two special programs on greenhouse flower and plant production. The first program is to be held tonight, January 18, at 7:30 at the Cleveland County Office Building, 130 S. Post Rd., Shelby.

This session is designed to bring new information to commercial flower growers that will help to improve their production operation; this session is designed especially for commercial flower growers and those persons who may be interested in starting a commercial flower production operation. The program is free to the public and all interested persons are welcome.

The second program being offered is designed with the homeowner, small greenhouse operator, or beginner in mind. The session is to be held in Lincoln in the lower assembly room of the courthouse beginning at 7:30 p. m., Wed., Jan. 10.

Specialists from North Carolina State University will be on hand for both the Tuesday evening and the Wednesday evening programs. Topics of interest during the programs will include greenhouse disease and insect control, bedding plants, watering systems, fertilization, discussions of specific flower crops, and greenhouse construction, heating, and cooling, plus many other topics of interest in flower production.
