Despite the rather archaic title, "Hanky Panky" — the Pineville Dinner Theatre's current offering — is anything but archaic in terms of well-rounded and hilarious entertainment.

Richard Egan stars in Larry Maraviglia's new play concerning the trials of a young unmarried teacher, her dubious lover and a recently divorced man with more charm than the law allows.

Egan is the charming divorcee, fresh from San Francisco and a 28-year marriage and newly installed in an apartment complex in Sacramento, California. Kathleen Singleton portrays Jennifer Webster, the unmarried young teacher who lives down the hall and Michael White appears as Roger Middleton, the very prim and proper teacher planning to divorce his wife in order to marry Jennifer.

What could be funny about such a triangle? Try this on for size: Jennifer is frustrated because, although she is seeing Roger, nothing is happening. It isn't because she doesn't try, however, it is because Roger vows to remain faithful to his estranged wife until his son's 18th birthday, the time he will divorce his wife.

"But, Roger! You're son is only 10 years old!" Jennifer remarks.

Enter Phil Stockdale (Egan) and the whole ball of wax starts to roll.

We have seen Egan woo beautiful ladies, do battle as a gladiator, gun down western badmen and even serve as the late Elvis Presley's big brother for the rock singer's film debut. Granted he didn't have many laughs in these roles, but as Stockdale in "Hanky Panky" it was pleasing to discover that Richard Egan's comedic acting talents are considerable. So considerable, it causes you to wonder about the judgment of Hollywood film producers: why they do not explore the deeper talent reserves of many actors labeled strictly as dramatic leading men.

Comedy is so much more difficult than drama for an actor and, true, many actors are incapable of sustaining the energy and timing comedy requires.

Fortunately, Richard

Egan does sustain and his timing and delivery ranks him with the best. This comment isn't so much puff but made out of respect for Egan's talent. You must bear in mind that Egan and company have performed this same show numerous times in numerous other theatres before settling for the Pineville run.

Besides having Egan for his lead, the author of this play should also be grateful for the strong supporting cast.

Ms. Singleton presents a refreshing "young thing-type" hue to her role. She is genuinely funny throughout the three acts and yet she retains the vulnerability and beauty vital to make the character breathe.

Michael White, by the very nature of his role, would be the villain of the piece since he stands in the way of the hero getting the girl, but there are no villains in "Hanky Panky". White's essay of "good" "ol Roger" is so prim and proper that he alerts the audience to the fact that he is in fact his own worst enemy. Very proper is Roger, but on his own level, as funny as they come.

And there is a fourth character, not introduced until the third act, who manages to elevate the already hysterical proceedings to an even higher level. The character is Margaret Stockdale, portrayed by Broadway veteran Chris Wilson.

Margaret is a complex character. She comes on wide-eyed, bewildered and proclaiming naivete, but beneath that you recognize she is a survivor. In the brief time she has to introduce all of these traits believably, Ms. Wilson proves she is a master.

"Hanky Panky" has so many unexpected twists and turns to try to spell them out would only spoil the fun for those of you who haven't seen the show. It's better that you make plans to see the play for yourselves. It's worth the trip and the money.

"Hanky Panky" is scheduled to run until the first week in December at Pineville Dinner Theatre. For reservations call 642-3481.
