QUESTION: Who is at risk for developing colorectal cancer?

ANSWERline: About the same number of men as women develop the disease and the likelihood increases with age, especially after age 50. Anyone with a personal or family history of colorectal cancer or of polyps in the colon or rectum should be examined carefully. Two other diseases of the digestive tract, chronic ulcerative colitis and polyposis, are also linked to colorectal cancer.

QUESTION: How is colorectal cancer treated?

ANSWERline: Surgery is the primary treatment for colorectal cancer, though radiation and chemotherapy are sometimes used in combination with it. Because of improvements in early detection and treatment and new techniques in surgery, only about 15 percent of people with cancer of the colon or rectum now require permanent colostomies.
