Ask About Wildlife

QUESTION: It's nearing the time when I normally start making food available to the birds that visit my back yard feeders. A friend told me recently that some people think it might be harmful to the birds to feed them during the winter. Is this so? If not, as I believe, what are the best types of food to place in my bird feeders? W.S., Spruce Pines.

ANSWER: If you have been feeding birds in your back yard for some time, you are undoubtedly aware that the food you make available significantly increases the numbers and types of birds that use the area around your home. There's nothing wrong with that. Thousands of North Carolinians get a great deal of pleasure from watching their feathered friends at their window sills and back yard feeders during the winter months—a time when it is difficult for many people to venture outside to enjoy Nature otherwise.

The one consideration you should have is to continue your feeding program once it has begun—at least until spring when natural foods become more abundant. The increased number of birds your feeders attract to the area can quickly deplete the natural foods that are available if your feeding program stops in mid-winter. Competition for food would be keen and some birds would be unable to gather enough to sustain themselves against the harsh winter.

As for the best types of bird foods, a study by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has shown that the black, oil-type sunflower seeds and white proso millet are the seeds preferred by the widest variety of birds. Cracked corn and wheat are also widely eaten. That study also showed that many of the seeds found in most commercial bird food mixes, such as flax, canary and rape seeds are rarely eaten by birds. The best source for your bird foods is your local feed and pet store.
