Pay A Christmas Visit To Nursing Homes

For most North Carolinians the holiday season is a time for love and sharing with family and friends

Many older citizens are not so fortunate. They no longer have a family or a home. Instead they live in nursing homes and rest homes across the state.

Nursing home administrators say today's patients are older and more disabled than ever before. Most are not able to leave nursing facilities for a Christmas with family, even if they have a family close by.

"December, January and February are lonely months," said Anne Hutchinson, adminstrator of the Louisburg Nursing Home. "Our residents could use some of the Christmas cheer then."

Ernest Messer, assistant secretary of the Division of Aging, encouraged North Carolinians to share a little of their time during the holiday season with those who are confined to nursing homes and rest homes across the state. "Older people with no relatives close by are so appreciative of time and attention," he said.

Nursing home and rest home professionals agree. To Hutchinson, the saddest person of all is the one who has no family. She remembers an elderly lady, now dead, who one year received gifts from the nursing home staff but refused to open them. "She wouldn't open them because she said the gifts could not be hers since she had no living relatives," Hutchinson explained.

Madlyn Jamison, activity director at Knollwood Manor in Raleigh, encouraged citizens to visit nursing homes and rest homes, and to get actively involved with residents. "One church group gives manicures during the holidays," she said. "The residents love this special attention. They need a hands-on project, not just to be surrounded by a large group of people."

Knollwood has a Christmas party for which many groups donate gifts, Jamison said. She suggested that persons who wish to give gifts to residents of facilities in their area donate lap robes, white knee hose for men and women, cushions for wheelchairs, stamps and stationary. Since many residents are on special diets, gifts of food should be limited, she said.

"The most important thing, though, is to take a little time out of your schedule to pay a visit," Messer said. "Bring an older person into your life, and you will see that you benefit from the experience as much as he or she does."
