

North Carolina Watermelons Are Safe

RALEIGH - Watermelon testing by the Food and Drug Protection Division of the North Carolina Department of Agriculture has revealed no signs of pesticides in North Carolina melons, results indicated today.

"We tested for Temik, or aldicarb as it might be known, and found no signs of that chemical, or of any chemical in any of the watermelons we tested," said

Bob Gordon, director of the Food and Drug Protection Division. "Based on the results of our tests, it is safe to eat watermelons grown and/or bought in North Carolina."

North Carolina consumers are continuously protected by a pesticide residue testing program performed by the Food and Drug Protection Division. Three years testing of fruits and vegetables in this state have revealed no signs of pesticide residues, indicated Gordon.

Consumers were recently warned of potential health dangers posed by pesticide residues from a limited number of California watermelons, but none of those melons entered North Carolina markets.

"I would like to encourage the consumers in this state and in other states to feel confident in buying and consuming watermelons," said N.C. Commissioner of Agriculture Jim Graham. "With this reassurance from Food and Drug Protection specialists, I can, without hesitation, say that North Carolina watermelons are apparently free of pesticide residues, and are safe to eat."
