By CLYDE DUPIN

It is time our public schools promote the teaching of traditional values. We are raising a generation of children who cannot distinguish between right and wrong. There is no law that prevents public school teachers from teaching character.

The clear intent of the secular humanist has been to create a value-free society. When our children have no understanding of right and wrong, they become frustrated and confused. Since our once taught traditional values were based on God's Word, the humanist way of teaching must go. Our value-free society has robbed one half of all girls of their virginity by the age of 17. Our sex education programs have given us one million pregnant teenagers each year. There is an epidemic of suicide among high school students. These sex education classes that do not teach moral values and provide contraceptives are destroying our youth. It is time our schools say what most parents say at home to their children. Our schools should teach children to say no to sex before marriage. When school boards and parents have had enough, then common sense and morality will return to the classroom.

Christians need to pray for teachers and school officials. They often need encouragement from the church and good citizens. They are pressured by liberal educators and influenced by secular humanism. Many times, they are unaware of their constitutional rights and fear undue peer pressure. To preserve our freedoms and liberties, we must preserve morality and traditional values in our schools.
