FIRST MODULE CHRISTENED-Officials of Combustion Engineering, Norfolk Southern, Clancy & Theys Construction, Sanders Brothers and N. C. Department of Education Thursday christened the first module in a shipment order for 54 heat recovery steam generators to be exported to Korea. Robert Starkey, left, general manager of Combustion's Grover Road Plant, and Larry Lansford, president of ABB Windsor, distribute ABB HRSG caps to employees at a plant picnic and stand before the first module ready for shipment. "They said it couldn't be done but the 150 employees proved it could," said Lansford.

First module completed

It weighs 117 tons. Laid end to end, one module is 11 feet high, eight feet wide and 62 feet long.

Combustion Engineering plans to export 54 of these modules to Korea from its Grover Road plant. Thursday plant officials christened one of the completed modules after a plant picnic.

Production of heat recovery steam generators here for export to Korea began in September 1990 when the Kings Mountain facility was awarded the first contract to manufacture them and Combustion became the first domestic supplier of the product.

Originally opened in 1984 to produce tubular products for the clients of Combustion Engineering Services, the facility is now fabricating a much different product which required major renovations to the plant. The layout of the facility was completely redone, consolidating Services work to a single bay, and opening up the second bay for the installation of new machinery and equipment necessary for building HRSG's. Additionally, a rail road spur was run from the Norfolk Southern main line into the back of the facility for shipment of the modules.

General Manager Robert Starkey said it took six to seven weeks to build one module of welded spiral finned tubes. Larry Lansford, president of Power Products Systems Manufacturers of Windsor, Connecticut, said the 150 employees here represent 200,000 man hours a year and have done what some said was impossible, building a unit that turns heat back into steam power. "The market is here and we expect to build 18 units, six modules to a unit, this year and in three years will be the world leader in production of this product," he said at the christening of Combustion's new product.

Sanders Brothers of Gaffney, S.C. did the detailed engineering for the project and design work was done in Windsor, said Starkey, who said the project is a month ahead of schedule.

"This is a significant event in the history of Kings Mountain," said Kings Mountain Mayor Kyle Smith, a guest at the open house and a former retired employee of the plant.
