Buyer's market can be good for seller, too

Low interest rates, available financing and a wide inventory of homes make for the ideal buyer's market. But what does that mean for the seller? "A buyer's market can be good news for the seller too, if he or she knows how to respond to the competition for buyers," says Charlene Ellie, President of the Kings Mountain Board of Realtors. "Most sellers will discover that with careful planning and attention to detail, they will find themselves in as attractive a position as the buyer."

Sellers wanting to attract serious buyers must begin by pricing the house in the right ballpark. "An overpriced house will discourage sellers from even looking at your house will discourage sellers from even looking at your home," says Ellie. "And if they don't look, there's no opportunity to even discuss negotiating the price."

Once you have decided on a listing price, making your house attractive to prospective buyers. "A few cosmetic touch-ups such as interior painting, can go a long way towards attracting buyers. Plant flowers in the front yard, clean out closets and fix those little things that you've been meaning to get to all year," recommends Ellis.

Once the house is listed, make an effort to keep it clean and tidy at all times. "Buyers expect, and generally enjoy, decorating a home to their taste," Ellis says.

The Kings Mountain Board of Realtors is one of more than 1,800 Boards of Realtors nationwide that comprise the National Association of Realtors and is the voice for real estate in Kings Mountain.
