

Farm Bureau presidents meet

North Carolina County Farm Bureau presidents from the mountain areas, the Atlantic coast and points in between recently met in Raleigh to conduct their annual President's Conference.

Representing Cleveland County at the meeting was county Farm Bureau President Wayne Yarbro.

According to North Carolina Farm Bureau President W.B. Jenkins, "With a new administration in Washington, a new Secretary of Agriculture and new rules and regulations affecting farmers at the state and federal level, 1993 will undoubtedly be an important year for everyone in agriculture."

As a vanguard organization for protecting the rights of rural North Carolina citizens, Farm Bureau works collectively to ensure that farmers make a fair income for their efforts. Likewise, the organization works to discourage legislation that might unfairly impact the farmer's ability to make a living from his land.

The annual President's Conference provides a forum for the 100 county presidents to discuss Farm Bureau policy, be brought up to date on issues of importance and receive staff reports on goals for the present year.

Issues agreed upon by the county presidents for special emphasis this year include deductibility of insurance premiums for the self employed, the impact of wetland regulations on farming, private property rights, and federal budget/federal deficit issues.

State Representative Edith Lutz, right, joins Cleveland County Farm Bureau President Wayne Yarbro at a legislative breakfast held during the organization's recent President's Conference in Raleigh.
