KM man keeps event on the air

When a severe ice storm hit the Columbia, Tn. area February 10 and left more than 500,000 homes without power, it appeared the Ladies Professional Bowlers Tour event in Columbia would be canceled.

However, an ESPN crew led by senior remote control engineer Joe Brock of Kings Mountain made sure it took place and was taped and aired.

Brock, who joined ESPN two years ago after 10 years with Jefferson Pilot Broadcasting Company in Charlotte, found that his mobile truck, which runs by a generator, was working. Brock had to carefully connect the building's fuse lines in case power came back in the bowling center while the generator was connected. Limited power would be for heating, only four lanes, lighting and the computer system which runs the lanes.

Brock said the computer system was knocked out by the storm and he had to disconnect and bypass the complex system so the lanes could be operated manually.

Brock started the job at 7 p.m. and headed to the hotel at 3 a.m.

Beth Brock, a substitute teacher in the Kings Mountain Schools, had driven her husband to Tennessee and she said the power was still off in Tennessee when she left to return to Kings Mountain. Thanks to her husband, the bowling event went on schedule.

Brock is on the road 300 days of the year with ESPN. He was in Los Angeles during the earthquake.

The Brocks are parents of two sons, Stuart, 11, and Daniel, 9. They have lived in Kings Mountain 10 years.
