SHERWOOD

 stories about how homework could not be completed because the student had to work late. Sherwood does not want to keep his employees from getting an education that will someday help them.

A graduate of Michigan State University, he taught the maths and sciences at the junior high level. He also coached football and baseball - two of his childhood loves.

From there, he traveled to St. Charles, which is right outside of Chicago, and taught for a few more years. Afterwards, he found himself in the printing business that he would stay involved with for 17 years before coming to own his own McDonald's.

The McDonald's venture did not come easy to Sherwood.

Becoming an owner of a store required much time and work - he actually had to work in a McDonald's Restaurant in order to purchase one. He put in 1,000 free hours.

One thing led to another, and Sherwood found himself in business.

Today, he says he coaches another sport - team management.

A man who dedicates much of his free time to civic organizations such as Smart Start, Rotary, Kiwanis, and Partnership for Children, Sherwood cares about the future of his employees, as well as the children in Cleveland County, which is where he wants to retire.

His employees usually get together for an annual softball game and Christmas party, and have rap sessions to vent out any sort of frustrations.

At the present moment, the restaurant is planning a Back-To-School program in which teachers from various schools will come to the restaurant for one evening and serve the students food at half price. The money the teachers make will go directly to the school and be used to the school's discretion.

"I don't want to build an empire," said Sherwood. "I just want to do a good job with the stores I have and provide an opportunity for kids."
