"We recommend the city adopt the Duke Power rate structure, less three percent," Little said. "That is the minimum amount the city can afford to adopt and be able to continue passing along the fuel cost adjustment to citizens without charging a fee for collection confection. Little said in the past year the fuel cost adjustment to the city totaled $180,099 and during the same period the city collected only $180,161. "The city has absorbed almost $20,000 of the fuel cost adjustment puid Duke by the citizens," Little said.

The city is under the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Com-mission, while Liuke's retail customers are under the N. C. Utility Commission. This means the state cannot take any action on behalf of the city to reduce the Duke increase. That action will have to come from the federal level. Duke has submitted a bond in order to charge the 9 percent to the city until the FPC makes a decision as to how much increase for power to Kings Mountain will be allowed Duke

"The city has no choice but to increase rates to local customers for electrical power until the Federal Power Commission makes its decision," Little said. Little said that basically the city's overall rates will remain three percent below the Duke Power rate, with the exception of area industry using energy in the 400 hour block. That rate will area industry using energy in the 400 hour block. That rate will vary as per usage. Mayor John Moss reminded citizens attending Monday's meeting that a study is being made of the possibilities of establishing a co-generation facility in Kings Mountain to bring cost relief to citizens and industry for energy. "We do not have any answers at this point," the mayor said. "The study is not complete. But if it should prove feasible, then the city could own its own electrical power generating plant." A by-product of such a facility would be steam of such high temperatures that it could be used in place of natural gas heat in industrial processing. If feasible such a facility would mean less natural gas used by industry and more being made available to
