Food Shopping In England

Continuing our weekly series of photos taken by Sylvia Holmes while she was in England recently, we are showing, this week, three pictures of different types of food for sale. Two shoppers spent quite some time in deciding which gooey cakes they would purchase from the tantalising display in a bakery shop window. Although sliced, wrapped bread sells well, many housewives prefer to buy a crusty fresh loaf daily. In addition to small stores devoted entirely to produce, fruits and vegetables may be purchased at supermarkets or from a market stall which could be located either inside a large market hall or in the out of doors. The photo shows typical displays of fruit on an indoor market stall. In front are gooseberries (for pie making), bananas, slices of water melon (all small, round imported ones), strawberries and peaches (also imported). Note the high price of peaches at 3 for 12 p-in other words 3 peaches for 31 cents. At the extreme left are cress (for salads), cucumbers (sold by the half or quarter because a whole cucumber is 15 to 18 inches in length) tomatoes and fresh mushrooms. Frozen fish sells quite well especially fish sticks but as most British cities are always very close to the ocean, a great number of fresh fish shops always do brisk business. This display on the fish stall of an indoor market shows fillets and steaks of halibut, cod and haddock. Also smoked haddock, herrings and kippers (smoked herrings). Smoked haddock and kippers are frequently eaten as breakfast dishes.
