CODAP

Where Kids Get High On Life

County schools have experimented with drugs and the nationwide statistic is seven of ten. There is a limited percentage of people who become addicted to drugs.

Sample believes this is a natural trend, because young people are so exposed to the drug scene. "They see their parents smoking or drinking", he said, "And so they say if Mom and Dad can do it, I can."

"Adults are sending a message to our young people", he declared.

Sample said youngsters in sixth and seventh grades are experimenting with glue sniffing, smoking catnip, trying marijuana, rebelling against their peers, just like the older kids.

What's the object? Sample says kids "want to get high." They want to see if drugs will affect them like they have heard.

He abhors what he termed scare tactics which began as a nation-wide effort in 1968 to deal with the drug problem. Trying to "scare the daylight out of your kids" only tends to "turn them off" and widens the gulf between kids and adults.

CODAP does not emphasize a strictly informational program, because, declared Sample, when you "show drugs like they are, how to shoot it, etc. you encourage and or glamorize drug usage."

What kids buy on the streets via illegal channels are dangerous, said Sample, because more times than not they don't get what they buy. One of the drugs sold in illegal traffic is an animal tranquilizer PCP, he said.

Sample said he envisions that the board of CODAP will soon include a youth member from each of the high schools in the county.

Rotarian Jerry King was program chairman and presented Mr. Sample.
