FEP Act Seen By 1981

On or before October 28, 1961 North Carolina will have a Fair Employment Practices Act. That's a flat CAROLINIAN 20th anniversary prediction. It's made despite the fact that not a single politician of stature in 1961 would endorse such a measure. Public opinion in North Carolina which in 1961 is beginning to take integration in public facilities and schools in strides will soon "go all out" for economic equality as well. THE CAROLINIAN believes. As of today, some 20 states, including pioneer New York, have enforceable FEP acts. These undergird legally the rights of all citizens to employment. Discrimination because of race, creed, or color is prohibited under such acts. New York's FEP law was enacted in 1946. Just last month, on Sept. 18, California observed the second anniversary of FEP legislation in that State. Of 11,000 cases complaining of discrimination in employment, the California commission reported that instances of discrimination had been found in about one third of the total cases reported. More than 85% of the cases investigated involved Negroes. The other complaints stem from discrimination in cases based on religion or national origins. In North Carolina, the 1961 employment picture for Negroes is far from bright. Not even in state government are there more than a sprinkling of Negroes. The picture is hardly brighter in industry where, partly under pressure from the federal government, some industries with government contracts are employing a token number of Negroes. By 1961, it is believed that political factors as well as a growing appreciation for fair play will result in more appreciable job gains. Generally, however, Negroes in the space age are likely to receive their greatest gains with FEP legislation. This will come only if there is a meeting of minds between Negro political forces and their white allies.
