

Labor Gives Its OK

King To Aid Hawkins In N. C.

Plans To Speak In 7 Cities

Dr. Reginald Hawkins' campaign for governor seems to be picking up steam as he rolls along. Even though a labor convention, held in Charlotte last week, was not able to get a two-thirds vote to support the militant dentist, quite a few of his supporters were highly pleased that he received more than 50% of the votes cast.

The support of the labor organizations became more intense Monday when James M. Pierce of Charlotte, coordinator of the Industrial Union Department of AFL-CIO said the committee took its cue from the 67-37 vote in favor of Hawkins and would work to get the Democratic nomination for him.

"The committee will be statewide in nature and will raise funds and work in any way we can to insure Dr. Hawkins' election," Pierce said.

The AFL-CIO in North Carolina has about 80,000 affiliated members but to date it has not been a cohesive political factor. Pierce said Hawkins and one of his two Democratic opponents, Lt. Gov. Bob Scott, were the only candidates to seek the endorsement of labor.

The third Democratic candidate is Mel Broughton of Raleigh. Republican governorship hopefuls are Jack Sticley of Charlotte and Rep. Jim Gardner, R-N. C., of Rocky Mount.

Pierce said labor "would not have supported the Republicans anyway because we don't like their programs."

Top NAACP Officials Make Appeals In North Carolina

Dr. Kith Kaplan, president of the NAACP, and Alfred Baker Lewis, treasurer, both white, were in North Carolina this week, making appeals for the organization. Kaplan spoke in Durham and Lewis appeared in Winston-Salem.

Kaplan said members will find "in numbers and in unity, there is strength," and asked for "sacrificial giving" to support the organization.

In an hour-long address to a relatively small crowd, Kaplan covered subjects ranging from the effects of integration on education to problems he has encountered in other areas of the nation in his civil rights work.
