"SOCIAL SECURITY TAX ON HOUSEHOLD HELP"

If you pay a maid, cook, or other household worker as much as fifty dollars cash wages in a calendar quarter, you must report these earnings for social security purposes. George V. Hess of the Raleigh Social Security Office pointed out that many employers and workers alike still have the idea that these wages are not covered or that coverage is voluntary. This is not so.

The law does not provide for a choice in this matter. If the wages from any one employer are $50.00 per calendar quarter or more, they are covered under social security. If wages are less than that amount, they are not reported. It is the employer's responsibility for reporting wages paid to domestic workers, Hess said. These workers, like any others, build up social security coverage to help protect them and their dependents from old age. Failure to report covered earnings not only deprives the worker and his family of this protection, but

"Many thousands of household workers have gotten valuable social security protection because their earnings were properly and timely reported," Hess concluded.

Noncredit Activities At NCCU Attracted Over One Hundred

DURHAM - While 1,660 students enrolled in courses for college credit this summer at North Carolina Central University, 153 were attracted to special programs which did not offer credit.

The 153 included 13 persons with learning problems participating in laboratory classes in special education, 20 youngsters in the nursery school conducted by the department of home economics, 12 persons who were enrolled in the speech and hearing clinic at the university, 35 elementary school youngsters in laboratory classes, and 29 teenagers in a youth development workshop offered by the department of health education.

In addition, 44 disadvantaged youth enrolled in a course in
