

DEAR SALLY

BY SALLY SHAW

DEAR SALLY: After five years of marriage during which I had to beg my husband for every extra dime, quarter, and dollar I happened to need for household and personal expenses, I finally began to help myself from his billfold at night while he was asleep, and during the past two years he hasn't missed the money at all and my little private bank account has mounted nicely. I happen to be a woman of high principles, but despite this I am still free of any pangs of conscience. There's also a feeling of satisfaction over the fact that my penny-pinching husband hasn't managed to save any money at all these past two years, while I have a healthy amount saved up. What have you to say about this? WISCONSIN.

The Veterans Corner

EDITOR'S NOTE: Below are some of the many current questions from former servicemen and their families. Further information on veterans benefits may be obtained at any VA office or your local service organization representative.

Q--I plan to attend college under the GI Bill, and understand that I must submit, at intervals, a certificate of attendance card. Is this true?

A--Yes, veterans attending college under the GI Bill are required to return a certification card to the VA during the last month of each enrollment period. Students studying under the GI Bill below the college level must submit a certificate of attendance card every month.

Q--I have read that some national cemeteries are filling up, and will soon close. Will VA pay an additional allowance toward purchasing a plot in a private cemetery?

A--There is no provision for VA to pay anything upon the death of a veteran except a statutory $250 burial allowance, unless he carries insurance administered by the VA. Also, the Army, not VA, is in charge of the National Cemetery System.

Q--Will the increased Social Security benefits cause me to have to pay back money to the VA if I go over the income limitation?

A--No. Your VA pension will be continued through the end of 1971. On receipt of your annual income questionnaire at the end of the year, your pension will be adjusted as appropriate.

'Sesame Street' Is Household Word

NEW YORK, N. Y. - The realization that the widely-heralded television series, "Sesame Street", is proving itself as one of the most advanced steps ever taken in the country for the pre-school education of youngsters has spurred its creators on to making sure that it becomes a household word.

The Children's Television Workshop, which created the program, in the past year set up the Field Service Coordinators whose job is to plant the seed of learning in every nook and corner of the United States.

Working in a dozen cities including New York, Chicago, Detroit and Oakland, coordinators search for children and their parents in underprivileged areas to make sure they acquire the Sesame Street viewing habit.

Mrs. Joan Ganz Cooney, CTW president, regards the field efforts to reach children who need an early education the most, as second in importance only to the actual production of the television series that is seen in all of the 50 states and many foreign countries.

"These children," she said, "are the major target of our show and it is only when we reach and teach them that we consider Sesame Street a complete success."

The work of the field coordinators involves them in encouraging minority and poor parents as well as teachers, day care and Head Start staffers not only to watch Sesame Street with their children, but to conduct various kinds of follow-up educational activities after the program.

Reinforce Show's Lessons Using a pre-packaged program approach, according to Mrs. Evelyn P. Davis, CTW vice president for community relations, they use the person to person contact, workshops and written materials.

To assure the success of the program the Field Service Coordinators work closely with neighborhood groups and out-community organizations to set-up viewing centers in the inner-city neighborhoods where there are large numbers of poor families. Almost 10,000 pre-school children have been reached using this approach. For example:

--In Detroit, the CTW coordinator, Richard Smith, works with the Highland Park Model

Cities program, using portable buildings at the schools, he has established a viewing center for preschoolers with parents running the project.

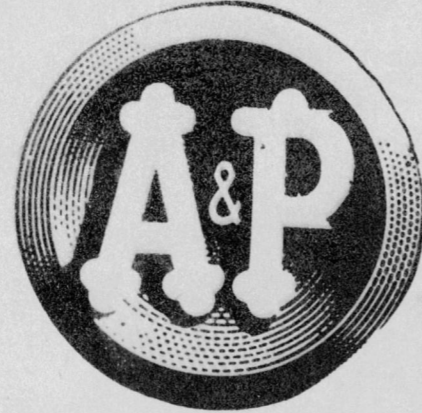

--Storefronts, public housing projects and community facilities have been utilized in New York City. Last summer teenagers conducted a program in the city's five boroughs.

--Working with social service aides and community organizers, the National Council of Negro Women and the Mayor of Jackson, Miss., extended the viewing of Sesame Street by setting up centers in various areas of the city.

--Community conscious people, the Field Service Coordinators are selected on the basis of their relationship with the inner-city and its myriad problems. They come from various backgrounds, Peace Corps volunteers, VISTA volunteers, teachers, social workers and community organizers.

Charlie Smith, newly appointed national director of Field Services, says "grass roots activity is their specialty."
