in them. He cited the national administration's failing economic policy as a primary source of the current housing crisis. Inflation has raised the cost of some housing by one-half," and high-interest rates have hit hardest in the housing sector.

"Look at the statistics and you will see why housing is beyond the financial reach of countless Americans. Unsubsidized housing is literally being priced out of the market. In 1965, an average Federal Housing Administration issued single family home cost $16,800. Today the same house costs $24,800. In 1965, the average monthly maintenance for a new house was $147, including mortgage payments, insurance, utilities and repairs. By 1971, the bill skyrocketed to $265."

In a speech delivered before the 32nd Product Executives Conference in Washington, D.C., on October 28, the Senator called for a number of reforms to help lower and moderate income Americans to afford the cost of buying and maintaining their houses. They include:

--New government subsidies and allowances for middle income families, and special assistance when "economic erosion" has made the cost of credit too high.

--Comprehensive property tax reform that would relieve moderate income families of the burden of their present high taxes.

Senator Muskie also recommended reforms to encourage investors to maintain or improve their properties. Because profits in housing now depend on depreciations, "an investor is not encouraged to hold properties over the long run nor improve them in the short run," Muskie said.

The reason for this is that under the present system of depreciation, an investor in housing receives his most favorable returns during the first years of ownership. But as time passes his depreciation allowances decrease, reducing profits, and therefore his incentive for maintaining or improving his properties.

Muskie offered two possible alternatives to the present system.

The first would be to substitute an annual tax credit for depreciation benefits. "The tax credit could be set at any appropriate level and it could insure higher profits the longer housing was held and properly maintained," Muskie stated.

The second proposal would be to modify the current depreciation system by supplementing depreciation benefits with direct government subsidies. This reform, Muskie said, "would attract new groups of investors. For example, people in declining neighborhoods adjustment of the retarded child in his own home and to provide developmental training experience for the child while in placement at the center.

In planning a comprehensive developmental training service, emphasis will be placed on self-help training, socialization, physical development, stimulation of intellectual processes, recreation, and health care. Equal emphasis will be placed on services to the family by providing relief to parents for part of the day, by assisting parents in development of complementary training programs in the home, and by referring families to social service agencies as needed.

Donald Smith "I am filled with mixed emotions about the widening of the road. I have children attending Lucille Hunter School and I think the widening of the road may entice drivers to drive faster in that area and this would make it a little dangerous for the children going to and leaving school. On the other hand, I would love to see the road widened to help the flow of traffic."

have the power of other superior court judges, but are assigned as needed across North Carolina.

Regular superior court judges are elected statewide, but must run for specific superior court districts and must be residents of their districts. The governor or the state is authorized to appoint eight special judges, who may be reappointed every four years.

Two higher levels exist in the state judiciary, the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court. No black men serve in those capacities. Two black judges serve as District Judges, the level below the Superior Court.

comment specific changes in the federal law and its local implementation.

The study proposed extensive revisions under four main headings:

1) Changes in the Economic Opportunity Act to make provision for the poor who do not reside in defined poverty communities, including federally-mandated citywide programs.

2) Changes in the criteria for designating poverty areas that would give more weight to income level and less to other factors.

3) Changes in the emphasis of federal antipoverty spending to give greater aid to aged persons.

4) Changes in the administration of the New York City anti-poverty program to assure greater representation of the Jewish community.

The Congress also urged that a citywide Jewish antipoverty organization, including neighborhood coordinating councils, be established by the Jewish community "to educate poor Jews on their rights and opportunities under existing programs and organize them to press for programs they need."

Among the recommendations for revising the Economic Opportunity Act was a proposal that would remove the present authority to designate areas for Community Action Programs from federal administrators or city officials and establish specific criteria for defining such areas in the law itself.

CAROLINIAN on Friday of last week.

Charles R. Jones, managing editor of this newspaper, contacted Mr. Foxwell and discovered that he was attending principals' meeting in Wilmington on the day of the assault and had left his assistant principal in charge of the school.

"Mr. Holhauser did not suspend Clifford Hansford as was reported," Mr. Foxwell stated. "The boy had missed nineteen days from school, prior to October 21, and a teacher was sent to the house to see what was wrong," continued the principal.

Mr. Holhauser gave the youth a letter at 2:30 p.m., last Monday, asking his parents to come to the school because Clifford had been interrupting several classes at the school by constantly talking and ignoring the teachers' pleas for him to shut up and not disturb other pupils and teachers.

The appointment of Francis J. Poole as a community development specialist was announced Tuesday.

Poole, 48, will be assigned to the department's Office of Community Resources where he will work with the Law and Order Division in its juvenile delinquency program. A graduate of St. Augustine's College, Poole previously served as a counselor in the Wake County School system.

They proceeded to the parsonage next to the church and could not get in. Forcing the door open, they found him dead in bed. An examining physician reported that he had been dead for sometime. It is believed that he died shortly after arriving from Raleigh, Sunday night.

Persons who knew him and talked with him Sunday night in Raleigh, at the closing session of the Central North Carolina Conference, were greatly surprised to hear of his passing.

He seemed to have been in the best of health on leaving Raleigh to return here. He played a very prominent role in the proceedings of the 51st session of the Conference, held at the Rush Metropolitan AME Zion Church in Raleigh November 3-7. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the general conference.

Funeral services are scheduled to be held at the St. James AME Zion Church at 2 p.m. Saturday with interment in High Point Sunday.

To Whom It May Concern:

"The incident that happened at Carnage Junior High School between the assistant principal, and Joseph Knight, involving his son and wife, was brought about by the lack of understanding, and consideration on the part of the assistant principal of the school (Mr. Holhauser).

"My son was told not to return to school unless one of his parents came with him for a conference. My wife went to school on Tuesday morning for this conference, expecting to discuss the problem with Mr. Holhauser, but instead of a conference, she was told by Mr. Holhauser what he was going to do to my son, and that was the end of it. My wife asked him why my son was being suspended in such a manner? His reply was that, "His word was law at that school, and she was there to defend her son, and he did not talk to defending parents, so therefore she and my son were dismissed. My wife insisted on knowing more of the reasons for this action. She was allowed to hear from the complaining teacher a brief summary of the incident that occurred in the classroom the day before, and was then told again by Mr. Holhauser that, 'He ran that school, and did not want to hear anything she had to say.' My wife then left the school, found me, and told me how rude she had been treated at the school by Mr. Holhauser.

"I went with my wife, and son back to the school to find out what the problems were. When I arrived I asked Mr. Holhauser was it true that he was suspending my son? He said, "Yes", and I asked him why?

He replied in both an arrogant and boisterous manner that, "He runs this school." I did not feel that this was any reason for suspending a kid from school, or speaking to a parent in this manner. I feel that if there is some type of problem in a school with teachers and students, the parents should at least be given a courteous explanation of the problem, and action should be taken, but instead of this my family, and I were met with arrogance from a young man that is supposed to be in the business of teaching, and counseling our young. If this is truly what he is about doing, then he should display courtesy and respect to both Black and White parents.

"I read in the newspaper that Mr. Holhauser said, 'That this is not a Black and White problem as some people think. That it was a parent problem,' I disagree entirely, because it is a Black and White problem. I am Black and he is White. I feel that this is the reason that we were not given the respect that was due us. We are not the only Black family that has had problems with this individual. I feel that unless there are some changes made regarding the assistant principal (Mr. Holhauser), there will be more problems with other Black families, because respect is a generated thing. In order to receive it you must give it. If no Black man ever stands up for that which he believes to be right, then who would ever want to be Black?" Joe Knight
