BY J. B. HARREN ROCKY MOUNT - James Edward Johnson, Drakes Com-munity, Rt. 1, Battleboro, N.C., is a very personalable 47-year-old Nash County Negro com-munity leader, who, is generally well-thought-of by both races (a difficult task in Eastern Tarheelia.)

Mr. Johnson has been employed by a local savings and loan business for 19 years. which means he is a trusted employee. His wife is the former Thelma Thorne, also of Nash County. They are the parents of six children, the oldest of whom is 25 years old. And all were "home for the holidays." Johnson is a member of the Governor's Committee on Law and Order serving a large eastern area. He is also a member of a Nash County member of a reasily committee which oversees the allocation, transfer and, or, expenditure of federal supplemental school funds. A Baptist deacon of nearby New Hope Baptist Church, Johnson serves in many local community activities and is particularly attentive to senior citizens. We salute Deacon James E.

Also in the Drakes Community - a Negro community founded ty - a Negro community lounded or built up by the late Berry Hunter - is William Alston, a pioneer black merchant, who has been incapacitated by reason of illness for a few years. His wife is the former Hattie Hardy, and they have been in business at Drake's Crossroads 37 years. 37 years.

Just across NC 48 is the merchant and auto dealer Richard Cooper, who grew up in his late Uncle Berry Hunter's store, and has been operating in his own right (along with his wife the former Lilia Hardy, sister to Mrs. Alston) for 35 years. The area is populated with black home-owners who are employed in area industry, schools and Wesleyan College. Cooper is the first and only black member of Nash County

Board of Education, which it took three elections to get. Two blacks have tried for a post on the County Commissioners Board, but it appears "the whites just ain't ready" for that kind of integration yet, at least, until the blacks get to voting in
