

FBI Policy Changes On Brutality Probes

National Black News Service
WASHINGTON - Acting FBI Director L. Patrick Gray said in an interview that the practice of using FBI agents to investigate police brutality complaints in the communities in which they are stationed is "unfair, to the agents, the police and to the public interest."

The new policy of assigning out-of-town agents to investigate those complaints came to light during the bureau's probe of the November slayings of two Southern University students in Baton Rouge.

Instead of assigning local FBI agents to work on the Southern deaths, the FBI flew in a special agent from Philadelphia. Gray said this practice is not meant to reflect on the integrity of FBI agents in a given locale, but that the local agents should not be put in the position of having to check complaints against police with whom they work closely on a daily basis.

Civil rights leaders have contended all along that local FBI agents should not be given such assignments.

Gray said the new policy was costly but it is in the public interest.

"Both the agents and the (local) police are delighted," he reported.

Southern Association Accredits Three Additional Institutions

Last month, three institutions in the technical institute community college system were accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools, making a total of 35 schools in the system accredited by this group.

All of the other 21 institutions in the system are undergoing evaluations and are following the necessary steps to become accredited, according to Herman G. Porter, director of institutional evaluation, Department of Community Colleges.

In addition, 16 institutions have been accredited by the State Board of Education and this year 14 more will have final reviews in the accreditation process.

"Institutional evaluation and accreditation are major ways in which community colleges and technical institutes are encouraged in their growth," said Porter. "It is through evaluation that appropriate quality is maintained. Accreditation is a method used to denote quality because the general public knows what the word accreditation means. And I have found prospective students as well as employers who hire our graduates want to know whether the schools are accredited," Porter added.

There are three major steps in the State accreditation program. First, the institution evaluates itself using prescribed standards. The institution is then evaluated by a visiting committee comprised of educators from across the State. Finally, the results of the first two steps are reviewed by a committee who decides whether to recommend accreditation for the applicant. The State Board of Education acts on the recommendation and actually accredits the institution.

"In the evaluation leading to accreditation, the adequacy of every aspect of an institution is examined. Some of the aspects are administrative staff, instructors, curriculums, student services, financial management and support, and facilities.

"These areas correspond to the areas covered in the standards and evaluative criteria adopted by the State Board of Education for the community college system," said Porter.

"These standards, which were developed by the Community College Advisory Council, are unique to the North Carolina system of community colleges and technical institutes and have served as a guide in other states in their development of standards.

Exxon Education Announces $942,600 In New Ed. Grants

NEW YORK - The Exxon Education Foundation announced grants totaling $942,600 to 151 colleges, universities and higher education associations.

The grants are being made under four of the Foundation's 1972-'73 programs: Engineering & Science, Special Assistance, Presidential Contingency, and Capital. Total Foundation grants for the academic year are expected to exceed $3.6 million.

Grants under the Engineering & Science program total $341,000 and will be shared by 73 departments of science or engineering at 54 public and private institutions. Use of the funds in each case will be determined by the department chairman.

Under the Special Assistance program, 24 grants totaling $286,600 will provide funds for organizations serving higher education and for programs in specialized areas of higher education.

Presidential Contingency grants totaling $215,000 will go to 80 private colleges and universities. The president of each institution will be asked to use the funds for unbudgeted items or activities that he believes will help further his institution's educational objectives.

Under the Capital program, a single grant in the amount of $100,000 will go towards the construction of an international studies building at Harvard University.

Commenting on the awards announced, Frederick deW. Bolman, Executive Director of the Exxon Education Foundation, noted that there has been a significant reduction in the size of the Foundation's Presidential Contingency and Capital programs.

"The Foundation is constantly re-examining and reformulating its programs in the light of the present and probable future needs of higher education," he said. "We believe the Capital and the Presidential Contingency programs have been successful both from our standpoint and from the standpoint of the academic community. However, given the changes that have occurred in higher education in recent years and the changes we see ahead, we feel they no longer represent the most effective use of the Foundation's resources and should be de-emphasized."

Dr. Bolman added that one new program, focusing on the improvement of college and university management, has been begun this year and that other new programs will probably be initiated in the near future.

The Exxon Education Foundation was established in 1955 to aid higher education in the United States. It is supported by the Exxon Corporation and a number of its divisions and domestic affiliated companies.

VA's First Special Unit For Stroke Victims Begun

The Veterans Administration's first special unit for stroke victims, dedicated recently at the West Haven, Conn., VA Hospital, could serve as a prototype for special stroke care units at other hospitals, VA Chief Medical Director Dr. Marc J. Musser said in Washington, D. C.

Developers of the unit were Dr. Lewis Levy, Chief of the hospital's Neurology Service and Clinical Professor of Neurology at Yale, and Dr. Jan A. J. Stolwijk, Pierce Foundation Fellow and Associate Professor of Environmental Psychology. The 16-bed unit is a joint project with Yale University.

Dr. Musser noted that acute stroke attack continues to be a major cause of death and disability in the U.S., especially in blacks. Survivors are left with a greater visible deficit of both mental and physical capabilities than in any other disease.

Dr. Musser said the new program will encompass intensive effort for improving the quality of survival for stroke victims and finding ways for stroke prevention. It combines treatment with special neurologic training for physicians, nurses and other personnel and the most advanced techniques for clinical study of the causes of acute strokes.

The core of the program at the hospital in West Haven is a four-bed intensive stroke care unit, in which each patient's blood pressure, electrocardiogram, electroencephalogram, pulse, and respiratory rate are regularly recorded into a computer and flashed across a television monitor in the nurses station.

These data and other diagnostic studies are used to establish diagnosis and guide physicians in the conduct of treatment.

The physical and mental impairment resulting from the stroke is evaluated and potential for recovery and level of recovery is estimated. Two to three weeks of additional hospitalization in a 12-bed recovery unit is provided to ready patient and family for return to home or to arrange for other placement.
