Yes, We All Talk

BY MARCUS H. BOULWARE, PH.D. OVERCOMING STAGE FRIGHT
QUESTION: Somehow when I get up to make a public speech, I simply freeze in one spot on the rostrum. What would you recommend to overcome this feeling? -Mrs. G.L.K.

ANSWER: The lack of self-confidence is what we call "stage fright." To say that some feeling comes over the flyer who goes on a bombing mission, or an actor in his first play is a natural thing, so forget it - is dismissing the problem too lightly.

If the speaker does not understand the stage fright reaction, then he needs some counsel as to what to do.

I don't have the answer, but these are what has helped many beginning public speakers. First, know your subject thoroughly. Second, practice delivering the speech several times but using different words each time. Third, stop and think about what it feels like to be nervous. Read books covering the functions of the central and autonomic nervous systems.

Fourth, talk about your nervousness among family and friends; take their suggestions as to how they would go about solving the problem of stage fright. Fifth, use cues to improve your memory. I usually counsel my students in public speaking classes to memorize the main and sub-points of the speech outline, and then word the speech in terms of how you feel at that moment. Surely, I have not said all that needs to be said. But you should be on your way to investigate this problem.
