Trio Still Missing, Sheriff Tells Scribe

HENDERSON · Vance County law enforcement officers are not too sure that the days of the Wild, Wild West are not upon us again. Some of them came to that conclusion about 1:30 a.m. Friday, when they found that a man had gone over a 6 foot chain fence, which surrounds the Vance County jail, shot the jailer and released two prisoners.

Sheriff Linwood B. Faulkner told The CAROLINIAN that as late as Tuesday afternoon, that there was no word, lead or clue, as to the whereabouts of the unwelcomed black intruder, who shot a night jailer and freed two immates.

The story begins rather unconventionally. According to information received from Sheriff Faulkner, Doug Person, a trustee, was found by Deputy C. C. Ellington, trying to get over the fence. Ellington is said to have inquired from Person what he was doing and he told him that Deputy Sheriff Thurston Medlin, who was serving as night jailer had been shot in the neck. He said he was beeking aid for the wounded man.

A merciful story of how Don Young, another inmate, rendered first aid to Medlin by clearing his breathing passage and giving mouth-to-mouth resusciatation, until medical aid arrived, was told. Medlin was taken to Duke Hospital. His condition was reported as being favorable Tuesday. It is apparent that Person was a witness to the whole matter. He is alleged to have said that an unidentified black man burst into the office area.

Briscoe was among a half dozen speakers who testified before CPB in behalf of more black programming. Among the others were: Rev. Jesse Jackson, president of PUSH (People United to Save Humanity); Tony Brown, dean of Howard University's school of communications and producer communications and producer of Black Journal; and James D Williams, communications director of the National Urban director of the National Urban League.

Rev. Jackson pressed for across-the-board improvement in the relationship of public broadcasting with the black community. This includes programming, employment and upgrading of blacks, and other facets of s.ation operations.

Dean Brown accused CPB of failing to meet its commitment to the black community and of being insensitive to its program needs. He cited how Black Journal has attempted to meet these needs, only to be penalized by CPB fund reductions. He vigorously demanded a restoration of cut funds and an expansion of his budget.
