Science Center Entices Blacks Into High Tech

ATLANTA (AP) — Clark Atlanta University officials hope their planned $36 million Research Center for Science and Technology will help propel more blacks into high-tech fields.

"The under-representation of minorities in science, engineering and math is alarming," said Thomas W. Cole Jr., president predominantly black private school. "The science research center will allow Clark Atlanta University to play a direct role in reversing those trends."

Ground breaking for the center is scheduled for Monday. It is due to open in 1991. Clark Atlanta is responsible for raising $13 million for the center; the remaining costs will be covered by federal funds.

The lack of blacks pursuing majors in the sciences is part of a nationwide trend that has seen the number of freshmen interested in such degrees fall by one-third in 20 years, according to a University of California study.

The new center also will serve as an incubator for black-owned high-technology businesses, and will provide math and science short courses and workshops for high school students and teachers, school officials said.

Publishers Tap Pat O. Thomas Again As Prexy

WASHINGTON — A primary long-term goal of the Republican National Committee (RNC) is attracting more black voters and helping black Republicans win local and state offices, GOP chairman Lee Atwater said during a recent meeting.

Atwater told 30 members of the National Black Republican Council's executive board that his short-range goal for 1990 is to win key elections to state legislative seats, giving Republicans a say when new congressional districts are drawn in 1991.

The discussion with the Black Republican group was the latest in a series of meetings Atwater has initiated with black civic leaders, businessmen and politicians since he became chairman in January.

Atwater said he hopes Republican candidates will get 20 percent of the black vote by 1992. In 1988, about 12 percent of black voters supported George Bush.
