VOICE

of information called teaching is not as simple as it looks. Because children are in a classroom we cannot assume that they are being taught. Because teachers are teaching to the best of their abilities we cannot assume that all children are learning or that if they aren't it is because they can't or are poor or that teachers aren't being nice to them. What we can say is that if they aren't learning the teaching methods are inappropriate to them and need to be changed. How dare I say that? Well, because at the point that children enter school they have already learned more and at a greater rate than most of them will learn for the rest of their lives (information that they have been able to gather without a lot of effort on our part). They've learned to walk, talk, mark on paper, stand, sit and crawl; all difficult tasks that have come from somewhere inside them and that prove that they can learn.

They have learned these tasks by (1) being developmentally ready (something adults can't control), (2) by observing others around them, and (3) by having their efforts positively responded to and through reward and encouragement. Some of these factors are not appropriately addressed in our classrooms. Especially for children who are poor, racially different and often sexually different than the majority of adults in the system. For this reason, black males have a particularly difficult time in our school system. If you have either of these differences you are at risk and if you have all three, the chances are that you will fail or not reach your potential in our system of education.

How, one might ask? I still don't understand how. It starts with a belief system. If we believe that people who are born poor are poor because they are lazy then when we attempt to teach something to a child who is poor and they don't learn it immediately, we may conclude that they haven't learned it not because we didn't address it from their experience but because they are lazy. If we believe that black people are inferior educationally and we try to teach them something from a white cultural experience, we might assume that they didn't learn it because they and their culture are inferior. If we believe that black males are more aggressive and potentially harmful to us we will notice their behavior more and when they walk into our classrooms with what may be a proud "I am somebody" walk, this may be perceived as a swagger and "I'm out to get you" walk that has to be dealt with and punished before you get me.

These perceptions of poverty, race, and sexuality are points not only to believe from but also to operate from and often, too often, they are self-fulfilling prophecies. Yes, we can elicit behavior from other people, especially children. Kids tell me that teachers look at their work and comment on other children's work. They say that if they give an answer in class the teacher says uh-huh but ask the same question of another student and when they give the same answer (maybe in another way), this child's response is commented on with a whole sentence. "Good thinking, Jane, that's an excellent answer."

One of the reasons I find that there are more children of African descent in special placements such as EMH, etc., is that these children are often referred more for testing. Unfortunately, our children are not used to discover the norms for the test they are given, therefore they may be more apt to not do as well on them. In addition, it has been said by some that children of different cultures learn differently and if their style of learning is not addressed, they will do poorly.

Why, someone might ask, is it that when the Department of Civil Rights comes to look for discrimination, they appear not to find it? The answer is simple. What they are doing is (1) randomly looking at records (they don't look at all records); (2) they are really looking to see if forms are in place and generally they find that they are, however forms don't discriminate, people do; (3) they do not look to evaluate whether or not objectives are appropriate, just rather to see if stated objectives are met. In other words, a paper trial normally doesn't produce discriminatory practices. Let's face it, people who discriminate generally don't write it down.

When interviewed from time to time about discriminatory practices, examples that are to me obvious are questioned rather than accepted. This seems somewhat illogical to me. If I've been a victim of discrimination and you haven't, it seems that I would be more likely to know what discrimination feels like. A case in point, when I was teaching two black male students came to me and told me that their white social studies teacher said to the class that black people would never measure up, could never make the SAT scores that white people could, etc. When I went to talk to her about it, she was appalled that I didn't agree with her. When I suggested that we compare SAT and NTE scores (mine and hers), she refused and instead went to the principal who called me in and asked me if I were not just a "little sensitive" about race. I think when we finished he realized that yes, I was, I am and rightly so; however, I don't think at that time that he recognized who, in fact, owned the problem. The teacher, however, did later, and wrote an apology. Unfortunately, her intellectual understanding did not make for her a behavioral change.

The final truth is when one's superiority is maintained by having someone else stay inferior in their minds or in their reality, you just can't expect them to recognize or encourage equality in the people they feel superior to.
