

N.C. Low-Level Radioactive Waste Facility Counties With Favorable Site Areas

WASTE FACILITIES—Wake County is among three other counties chosen as favorably suited in the state for waste materials to be disposed. Low-level radioactive waste materials are produced by many commercial enterprises, medical practices and university laboratories. Much of the waste to be disposed of in North Carolina contains rapidly decaying materials. However, none of the counties want the facility.

Bobby Womack Returns Scene With New Album

Veteran soul singer Bobby Womack is back on track with a masterful new album, "Save the Children," slated for release in early December on Solar/Epic Records.

"Save the Children" contains 10 new songs produced or co-produced by Womack; he co-wrote four songs on the LP, played guitar throughout, and of course sang all lead vocals. Bobby's special guests include singers Frankie Gaye (brother of the late, great Marvin Gaye) and Leon Ware; guitarist Carlos Santana, whose distinctive sound graces "Too Close for Comfort" and "Tough Job;" and saxophonist Gerald Albright, who solos on "Free Love" and the title track, "Save the Children." The Rolling Stones' Ron Wood painted the album cover, and the liner notes were penned by another longtime Bobby Womack fan: actress/author Joan Collins.

Bobby Womack's associations and accomplishments over the course of his 30-year career read like a survey course in pop and R&B music. At 16, he was Sam Cooke's lead guitarist; at 21, he was playing on sessions with Aretha Franklin and Ray Charles while producing and writing some of Wilson Pickett's biggest records, including "I'm a Midnight Mover" and "I'm In Love." Bobby Womack songs have turned into hits for everyone from the Rolling Stones ("It's All Over Now") to George Benson ("Breezin'"). And his own lengthy solo career has yielded a dozen top 10 R&B hits, including the No. 1 singles "Woman's Gotta Have It" and "Lookin' For a Love."

Talk About AIDS

What Do You Do When Your Best Friend Has AIDS?

Susan: First you cry. Then you decide if you can go through this with someone or not.

Can you?

You're tired, aren't you?

Susan: Exhausted. People really have no idea about AIDS.

Tell them.

Susan: Every day, I do.

New Employee Training Needed To Break Welfare Cycle

By David M. Cooney

(NU) - Recent changes in legislation have placed great emphasis on moving recipients of welfare and disability payments into the work force.

This results from two factors. The first is a recognition that welfare, originally designed to provide temporary assistance to those in need during hard times, has become a way of life for a large number of Americans. They are literally trapped in the welfare cycle by dependence upon government programs to provide food, shelter, and medical care. However, these programs do not offer either the incentives or the training necessary to enter the work force.

The same is true of Social Security Disability payments. Although the law calls for retraining, fewer than one percent of those eligible actually receive it.

Jobs Increase, Work Force Decreases

The second factor is the increase in the number of jobs available while the actual number of persons entering the work force after completing school is decreasing. This means that employers are going to have to look in new directions to find employees. The most logical sources are those persons now unemployed but who are capable of working with proper training and proper incentives.

Both are important. Welfare and disability payments, medical care and other benefit programs are lost when a person gets a job. Individuals can often have greater economic security and less social risk by remaining unemployed bearing in mind that most jobs require some training, even at the entry level. Small employers are hard pressed to pay the costs of training, especially when individuals have no prolonged work history.

As a result, we are paying people not to work when jobs go unfilled, when the funds would be better used to support adult job training programs which will remove persons from the welfare rolls while providing needed employees.

Adult Training Needed

In addition to savings to welfare and Social Security, taxes on new income will add to federal revenues. To achieve these desired results, creative legislation is necessary to continue health care programs until new employees are covered by employers' plans. Also, a concerted effort to provide job readiness and job skills training is essential. Because many of the individuals trapped in the cycle have had unsuccessful school experience, the public schools are not always the best answer. New approaches are needed.

At present, there are a variety of programs operated in the community which involve potential employers in the development of training goals and programs. Cooperation with community-based adult training programs like those operated by Goodwill Industries will be needed. Such community programs are an important part of a solution to a very important problem. They deserve the wholehearted support of business, educators and the public.

David M. Cooney is president and chief executive officer of Goodwill Industries of America. ★
