THIS IS OSPREY EYRIE BUILDING SEASON IN DARE

By Aycock Brown There are scores of construction jobs underway on the beaches and islands of the Dare coast at the present time. Just about everything from cottages and clubs to motels and restaurants are being rushed to completion before the summer season, but the busiest builders are a pair of ospreys, destined to set up housekeeping in the top of a dead pine between Wanchese and Manteo.

This pair of osprey decided to build their eyrie almost within a stone's throw of the state highway in the upper crotches of a pine skeleton that is not hidden from view by surrounding pines still alive and green. The construction activities have attracted more than usual attention of persons making the trip between the island communities.

Bird watchers and amateur ornithologists have expressed the opinion that they are young osprey, setting up for their first venture in housekeeping. These opinions are based on the fact that their eyrie was started this year and is yet not completed.

"If they were old birds, they would be returning to their old eyrie, and conducting an expansion program, rather than building a new nest," said an angler from New York State whose conversation changed from fish to fish-hawks after seeing the pair of osprey at work. Their eyrie is already a hundred times larger than the nest of a robin or mocking bird. As the nests receive additional material every year, many in time become huge affairs, weighing from one thousand to 1,500 pounds. There are many osprey nests, large and small, on Roanoke Island.

Most of them are built well away from habitation in marshes or woodlands. The nest south of Manteo on the Wanchese road is an exception. The tenants of these eyries are birds of prey, but usually feed only on fish or eels they catch by plunging foremost from altitudes of 40 to 80 feet into waters of sounds and creeks. Their prey is held with needle-sharp talons until they reach their eyrie or a suitable place to enjoy their lunch.

GOOD RANGE ESSENTIAL TO VIGOROUS LAYERS

Good range can cut poultry feed costs as much as 15 per cent, according to R. S. Dearstyne, head of the State College poultry science department.

Dearstyne says the first requirement of a range is cleanliness. The land should neither have been occupied, nor poultry manure spread on it, for at least a year. The land should be rolling and the soil porous to assure good drainage. The range should be free of deep depressions where stagnant water can accumulate.

Legumes are often the best grazing crop; clovers and alfalfa are considered excellent by Dearstyne. Once the birds are moved to range, careful management is a must, since the ranging period is a critical one. Start your range shelters at the bottom of a slope and gradually move them uphill, each move 50 feet from the previous location.

Dearstyne says there will be a bumper crop of pullets in North Carolina this year. "The success we obtain from these birds will depend largely on how carefully the poultryman has planned to grow them out."
