GASTON TECH TO OFFER TECHNICIANS COURSE
By PEGGY CHEARS
Raleigh. — One of industry's major needs in North Carolina is for engineering technicians who are specifically trained to assist engineers in the design of machinery and equipment.

In the newly-organized two-year mechanical and production technology course opening this fall at the Gaston Technical Institute in Gastonia, students will gain specific training in tools and machines. The training will emphasize design and maintenance of production equipment as well as the mass production of goods produced through machine operations. The curriculum, planned and approved by the North Carolina State College School of Engineering, includes engineering drawing, algebra, English, physics, trigonometry, and general shop during the first year.

Subjects for the second year's work cover machine shop, tool and die design, statics and strengths of material, descriptive geometry, materials, electric circuits and machines, machine drafting, production technology, personnel supervision, technical reports, and production and quality control.

The development of new and improved machinery in the state's expanding industries makes this an important and growing field for the technician.

High school graduates interested in enrolling in this course or in electrical, electronics, or civil technology should write the Gaston Technical Institute, Box 1399, Gastonia, N. C.

Catalogues on the school's new curriculum will be mailed upon request.
