The begonia owes its name to a French amateur botanist, Michel Begon, an administrator in the West Indies at the time of Louis XIV, the National Geographic Magazine says. The plant reached England in 1776; its culture in Belgium began in the middle of the 19th century. Today the begonia is to Belgium what the tulip is to the Netherlands. The bulk of Belgium's huge crop of begonia tubers is exported, mostly to the United States.
