Ribs Can Be A Charcoal Specialty

Just-right ribs, crispy brown outside, tender and juicy inside can be one of your outdoor specialties.

Pork spareribs are the rib bones from the bacon strip with little meat between. Many people prefer these for crispness. Those who like extra-meaty ribs should buy loin back ribs. Consult your friendly supermarket meat manager when buying.

Free B-B-Q Booklet

Ribs are just one of many delicious meats ideally suited for charcoal cooking. If you would like our new summer folder on outdoor cooking, just write to me: Nancy Carter, P. O. Box 4358, Atlanta, Georgia. Just say "Free BBQ Booklet" and I'll send it to you.

Prize Barbecued Ribs

Buy about 1 pound ribs for each serving. Have meat at room temperature. Lay ribs on grill well above hot coals. Cook very slowly, turn frequently. Long, slow cooking is required so allow 1 1/2 to 2 hours. To test for doneness, bones should move easily and there should be no sign of pink meat next to bone.

To smoke-barbecued ribs, wait until last 30 minutes of cooking to brush on barbecue sauce, or brush on the sauce just before ribs are served. This way, the ribs get full benefit of the hickory-smoke flavor.

Speedy Grilled Ribs

Cook ribs in pressure cooker then grill over hot coals for an outdoor finish. If desired, brush with your favorite sauce while grilling. Or, add a few drops of liquid smoke to the sauce for a smoky taste.

Western Rib Sauce

1 cup catsup
1 cup water
1/4 cup vinegar
3 tablespoons worcestershire
1 teaspoon chili powder, optional
Dash tabasco
1 teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon celery seed
1 tablespoon sugar
Combine all ingredients. Heat to boiling; simmer 30 minutes. Makes enough for basting about 4 pounds ribs.
