...on the march

North Carolina is considered the most advanced among the Southern states in economic development and industrial growth.

High on the list of contributing factors to this progress is the economic impact of the Malt Beverage industry. Alone it makes a substantial contribution in terms of people employed, plant and rolling stock investments and taxes paid. This industry not only pays some $3,500,000 in the usual corporation, personal and sales taxes each year, but also provides the State and counties with specific excise taxes of some $8,000,000 annually. According to the best available estimates, the Malt Beverage industry contributes approximately $43,000,000 annually into the economic stream in North Carolina.

As North Carolina moves forward in its economic development, you find an enlightened viewpoint growing that demands the legal sale of beer and ale. Many towns in otherwise "dry" counties have exercised their local option privileges to permit "legal sale."

After all, it is an inescapable fact that retail business in legal sales counties is much greater; per capita income is much higher and these counties lead North Carolina on the march to industrial development.
