

SENATOR SAM ERVIN SAYS *

WASHINGTON.—One of the pressing needs today is some thought about fundamental principles of government. Constantly Congress and the public must be concerned about the struggle between the people, on the one hand, and governmental tyranny, on the other hand. In the landmark case of Ex Parte Milligan, this struggle was pointed out by the great constitutional lawyer, Jeremiah S. Black, who stated that the American Constitution was the product of "seven centuries of struggle between the people and governmental tyranny."

Congress faces legislative proposals which continuously emphasizes this contest. There is, therefore, need to recall that the English barons wrung the Magna Charta from King John at Runnymede in 1215 to safeguard individual rights, that the English Parliament sent the "Petition of Right" to King Charles in 1628 in a recurrence of that struggle, and that this nation has witnessed more contest over this issue than possibly any other.

Currently this issue is evidenced in many bills which Congress is asked to enact, but none more sharply draws the issue into focus than the civil rights proposals. In recent weeks I have attempted to conduct in the Senate Judiciary Committee a battle in behalf of all Americans who love liberty and constitutional government. We have reached a moment when men in our nation propose to regulate by governmental order the attitudes and sincere beliefs of our citizens. This runs contrary to classical principles which assert that citizens shall enjoy the right of freedom of thought and freedom to conduct their business and occupations in accordance with their judgments.

It is here that the 1963 civil rights proposals challenge serious constitutional and human difficulties. In essence the civil rights measure seeks to supersede the judgment of individuals at local and business levels with the judgment of unknown men in Washington. Congress and the people in examining this bill should find that this loss of liberty carries the very high price of governmental dictation over a very wide area of human affairs.

APPROPRIATIONS.—Congress received some reassuring news last week in a 50 minute speech by House Appropriations Committee Chairman Clarence Cannon. He indicated that the appropriations trend appears to be toward lowering the $85 billion budget by several billions at this session. He pointed out that caution exercised on appropriations bills can work both ways, but that this year with the first five years' budgets old it appears to be on the side of economy.

The Chairman concluded:

"It seems reasonable, as noted, to venture the suggestion that this session, for the first time in some years, the regular ap-

The Chairman's prediction may indicate that the country is becoming more interested in fiscal responsibility on the part of the Federal government which I have long advocated.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Take a look at your 1962 W-2 form, take a long look! See that figure over "FICA Employee Tax Withheld?" That's how much you paid for your social security account-for these earnings? I hope so . . . and chances are you did.

Over 130,000,000 of us have personal records of our taxable earnings kept for us by the Social Security Administration. When reports of our earnings are received, the Social Security Administration adds them to our personal account. They understand that many people have similar names, so they use both your name and social security number to make sure you get full credit for your earnings. Quite simple you may say—but could I fail to receive credit?

The Social Security Administration receives over 260,000,000 wage items per year. And because you or your employer are sometimes careless, errors do occur. Some items are reported the job, with incorrect names or numbers, and some without numbers. Until both your correct name and number are located you get no credit for these improperly reported wages.

Mr. Employer—Did you ask your employee to show you his social security account number card, or did you rely on his memory? If it's taken from the card, it's right. We want you to get credit for all of your earnings—and we will gladly send you a postcard form that you may use to check the accuracy of your record. You need only to fill out the card and mail it. Shortly after you send your request, you will receive a statement. You can then check and make sure your earnings have been properly reported.

Mr. Employee—Did you show your account number card to your employer, or did you furnish it from memory? You girls who were recently married—did you get your name changed on your account number card? Our modern electronic data processing machines with "memories" are able to store tremendous quantities of information on reels of magnetic tape, and keep the records accurately and keep them up-to-date quickly. But even these machines must have the correct names and numbers in order to properly do
